NATION IS AROUSED BY PATRIOTIC POEMS

Prominent Figure in Japan's National Life Passes Away.

BY LA MARQUESE DE FONSECA.
In England poetry has been officially recognized for hundreds of years past by the crown office of Poet Laureate, which carries with it membership in the royal household, a small salary, and several perquisites and prerogatives. It has been filled by some men of the highest literary distinction, like Tennyson, Wordsworth, etc., but has been more commonly occupied by insignificant versifiers like the poet laureate of the United States, who is appointed solely because of his name.

Switzerland was unavailable, on account of the revolutionary character of much of his work.

In Japan, however, poetry plays such an important role, that there is a government Department of Poetry, with a minister of state at its head. He is the only minister who does not go out of office with the cabinet; in fact, he is permanent. The nobleman who has held this position since 1883, Baron Takasaki, has just passed away at the advanced age of eighty. He was a notable figure in Japanese life, and his death is mourned by the nation.
